

As we make our journey through this strange new frontier, I am constantly in awe of the mere size of everything. The river is vast. The sky envelopes us. The forests seem to stretch into infinity.

I must not forget to consider the smaller things.

We remain on lookout for large animals and abominations that want to separate us from our heads.

But there are other dangers, smaller in stature, but no less capable of becoming the agents of our undoing.

*I owe Mister Etten
a debt for reminding me of this today.*
