"The impossible isn't a limitation, it's an invitation." That's what my father always told me.

Well, I think that's what he always told me. My dad--Dr. Goliath Horowitz--passed away when I was only six...

... and sometimes my memories of him get mixed up with my fantasies about what it would be like if he'd never died.

Could be I only know that quote because it's on a plaque in the lobby of his headquarters--the Impossibuilding--and I've walked past it just about every day of my life.

I say that Dad died, but the truth is no one really knows for sure.

Eleven years ago he went off on one of his secret missions: took a ride on an experimental vehicle called the Non-Local Express...

Meaning that our essential concepts about the universe are all wrong. Time only exists because we think it does. Distance between objects is just an illusion. And with the right tools...

...we can access every level of (so-called) reality: travel across centuries, journey to other worlds, other dimensions. The possibilities are limitless.

...because I've lived it.
