THE UPPER EAST SIDE.

1 AM.

L-LET ME GO!

You know...

...that's a great idea.

RUN.

Manhattan is a strange place.

For everything that happens here, and its importance to the world in so many ways, it's not very big.

Thirteen miles from top to bottom, and a little over two across at its widest point.

But the way the neighborhoods work, you might never see most of it. You've got where you live, and where you work, and maybe where you go out.

Everything else might as well be a different country.

I've been back in the city for almost a year now, but I've never had a reason to get to the Upper East.

Until this guy. Now, I could have taken him down a minute ago. I had him beat.

But I haven't been in this part of town since I've been back, and who knows when I'll get up here again?

Chasing this poor no-hoper lets me reacquaint myself with the neighborhood a bit.

Is that mean?

Nah. This is more than just a chance to see the town.

New York City is alive. And living things change. For example...

...this flagpole didn't exist last time I was up here.

There could be a time down the road when I'm running for my life, with no time to relax and let the radar sense do its thing.

Knowing this flagpole is here could keep me alive.

Ah. There we go.

If I'm being honest, this wasn't just about doing a little sightseeing.

Heh.

Why take out one bad guy...

...when I can take out four?
