

Some minutes before dawn on this date of publication, one Capt. Murray of the 29th Foot made the discovery of provocative bills posted on the wall along Bishop's Alley, south of Milk Street.

The commotion caused by several individuals of the Foot was enough to rouse the citizens in the immediate area, and soon a cordon was established and order demanded. The posted bills were burned.

No soul has been held responsible, and investigations carried out by the soldiers remain fruitless. The posted notices seek to incite and inflame passions against this occupation.

Soldiers carrying fixed bayonets are patrolling Milk, King, and Summer Streets and making inquiries at local printing houses and type foundries.

Certainly this fine colony endures much from the House of Hanover, and the biting language of these notices bears this out.
